Research profile

I study how political elites and ordinary citizens form preferences about controversial political issues, and how elites shape political views and the political behavior of citizens through mobilization, persuasion, and information provision. My research investigates both contemporary examples of political conflict, such as European integration, and historical cases, such as the formation of class politics. I approach these and other instances of political conflict from a comparative perspective and I treat them as manifestations of a long term process of political development. To understand this process and its manifestations as distinctly political phenomena, I combine the comparative analysis of macro-historical developments and configurations with a micro-level psychological perspective that pays attention to both cognitive and motivational factors. My research engages the fields of Comparative Politics, EU studies, political development, political behavior, public opinion, and political psychology. The geographical focus of my research is on Europe and the United States. Combining quantitative and qualitative approaches, the methods I use to carry out my research include experiments, comparative case studies, survey design and analysis, aggregate data analysis, elite interviews, text analysis, and decision analysis.
